WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA:

The West Coast remains in a progressive weather pattern, with the Northern California presently under the influence of weak high pressure aloft. The next Pacific weather system will be a very weak one, just brushing the far northwest part of the state in two phases between late today and late Wednesday night. The next storm comes shortly after, and it is a much cooler and stronger one, coming from a deepening offshore low pressure trough. Its cold frontal band should start producing rain over the North Coast Thursday afternoon, and then progress gradually southeast into the Northern California interior Thursday night through midday Friday. The trailing cold upper trough will continue to produce scattered to occasional showers later Friday, especially over higher and eastern terrain, until it exits east of Northern California by midday Saturday. Look for snow levels to come down to as low as 4000-5000 feet, in the final 12-24 hours of the system. Pre-frontal south to southwest winds will pick up over mid to higher terrain on Thursday afternoon, but on Saturday most areas will see the shift to post-trough northwest or north winds.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

High pressure along with light easterly flow will produce a sharp warming trend through Wednesday. High temperatures over the next couple of days will leap 10-12 degrees over yesterday's readings with some lower 90's possible in the valleys as well as the foothills below 2,000 feet. While no strong offshore winds are expected, east winds of 10-20 mph will be possible near the Banning Pass Wednesday. Minimum relative humidity will fall into the 10-15% range during a 3-4 hour period today and Wednesday at lower elevations, but good recovery can be expected tonight courtesy of the long nighttime hours. Later this week and into the weekend, a deep low pressure trough will head into the Pacific Northwest and the tail end of a trough is expected to sweep through the area Friday and Friday night. Windy and cooler weather will develop heading into the weekend. Strong south winds will be possible across the Owens Valley Friday with gusty west winds likely in the deserts Friday afternoon through Saturday. A band of precipitation will likely accompany the passage of the trough as it moves from north to south Friday afternoon through Friday night. Up to an inch of rainfall may occur across Big Sur northward through Monterey County and in the Sierras north of Fresno County. The snow level may fall to 6,000 feet late Friday night and some accumulation will be possible in the Sierras. Some light showers may even reach areas near the mountains across Southern California late Friday night, but rainfall amounts will be extremely light south of Point Conception. Temperatures Saturday will remain in the 60's to lower 70's in the valleys behind the passage of the system. Sunny and much warmer weather will develop during the first half of next week and highs should climb to above normal readings by next Monday or Tuesday.
